Man: Hello, today I'm talking to Zoe Smith who has started her own business. It's a clothes library. Zoe, can you explain what a clothes library is?

Zoe: Well, it's a place where people can borrow good-quality second-hand clothes for a fee. The only thing borrowers have to do is to return the clothes undamaged, or if an item is damaged then there is an extra fee for it to be repaired. Apart from that we do everything. We clean and iron each item so that the next person can borrow and use it.

Man: How did you get the idea of starting a clothes library?

Zoe: I first thought of it at my sister's wedding reception. I was giving my speech and wanted to make people laugh, so I said something like: "What I miss most about the time when my sister and I still lived at home is definitely her wardrobe." When I said those words, I suddenly realized that they were true! I used to borrow a lot of clothes from her. After she moved out, I was left with just my own boring old clothes and nothing cool to wear. But apart from that personal aspect, there was another even more important reason why I opened my clothes library.

Man: What was that?

Zoe: Every year millions of tonnes of clothes worldwide are just thrown away.

Man: Really? Millions of tonnes? Are you sure you're right?

Zoe: I am, unfortunately. A lot of clothes are badly made so it's not worth reselling them and they end up in the dustbin. Apart from that, many people want to continually change their look and be fashionable. So, they keep on buying new clothes, and then throw them away. They do this over and over again. But some people can't or don't want to spend a lot of money on clothes. A clothes library makes this possible and without the waste.

Man: I see. So clothes libraries offer people a variety of clothes they want at a lower cost, without creating huge amounts of rubbish and pollution.

Zoe: Yes, borrowing clothes saves you money and that means my business is very attractive to people. But what I care about most is helping the environment. I strongly believe that even the smallest step we take towards a cleaner earth is well worth the effort.

There are two colours in your school uniforms: blue and white. Today, as you start at this school, I want to tell you about the special meaning behind the choice of these colours. Blue stands for loyalty and responsibility, while white represents peace and non-violence. I hope that your uniforms will always remind you of these qualities. I'm glad that you have chosen our school. Be proud of your uniform and what it represents. And have a fantastic time here!

When you're near Paris, make sure you visit Claude Monet's house and gardens in the small village of Giverny. This well-known French artist created many of his masterpieces there. Many people share the opinion that the artist's home is unforgettable because of its colours: it has bright pink outside walls, and intense blues, greens and yellows inside. These were all chosen by Monet to reflect the colours which he used in his paintings. Why not experience the magic of Monet for yourself.

Have you ever wondered how rainbows are formed? Do you know how colours affect our mood? What are the results of mixing colours? Do you want to find out the answers to these questions? Just sign up for our Light and Colour workshops at the Science Centre. You will use different coloured lasers to discover the effects of mixing colours. You'll also have the opportunity to create your very own light show. The two-hour workshops will be held every Saturday evening in July and they are free of charge.

So, as you can see, there are three small bottles standing in front of you. Each of them has a different colour of paint inside – red, yellow and blue. These are called primary colours. All other colours can be made out of these three. For today's task, you'll be mixing colours. I'd like you to use the sheet of paper I've put on your desk. Now pick up your paintbrushes and start creating your own colours.

Hi! I'm in the shop right now, choosing the paint for my dining room. I'd like it to look warm but bright at the same time. So I thought about orange or yellow perhaps? But the shop assistant has suggested green. He says it will make the room look bigger. I can't make up my mind. What would you choose? I'll send you some photos of the colours in a minute.

House plants may not need daily walks or trips to the vet, but that doesn't make them easy to look after. Now plant owners who won't be home for a few days or weeks have a place in London where they can leave their plants. It's called the Patch Plant Hotel, and it's totally free to use. But remember that you have to book in advance because space at the hotel is limited. If you contact the hotel at the last minute, it's likely that they will not be able to accept your plants. If you live in the London area and you're planning a trip, head to the Plant Patch website as quickly as possible and select the date you wish to drop off your plants and when you'd like to pick them up. When you leave your plants, they will be carefully looked after by Plant Patch Hotel volunteers. They know how to deal with even the most exotic plants.

Let me tell you about a funny mistake. In October 1977, Erwin Kreuz, a German tourist, was on his way from Frankfurt in Germany to San Francisco in the United States. After reaching the east coast of the US, Kreuz's plane landed for a short stop at a small airport in the town of Bangor. Mr. Kreuz, however, thought he'd arrived at his destination and so he left the plane. Although there was no Golden Gate Bridge or Alcatraz, he spent four days in Bangor, convinced he was in San Francisco.

One problem was that he hardly spoke any English! Eventually, Mr. Kreuz asked a cab driver, in his poor English, to take him to San Francisco city centre. The cab driver told him that San Francisco was 3,000 miles away on the west coast, and that Kreuz was in Bangor! Mr. Kreuz didn't understand him at all, so the cab driver asked a policeman for help.

The policeman also couldn't get Mr. Kreuz to understand that he wasn't in San Francisco. But luckily, the policeman knew a woman who ran a German restaurant and spoke German. The policeman drove Mr. Kreuz to the restaurant, and the owner explained to the lost tourist in his own language where he really was. He was so surprised! Soon, reporters found out about Mr. Kreuz and he became famous in Bangor after his story appeared in the local newspaper. When officials in San Francisco learnt about Kreuz's story, they paid for him to fly there and provided him with a guided tour of the most famous places in San Francisco.

At the airport before boarding his return flight to Germany, he put on a T-shirt with a message on it which read: "Please let me off in Frankfurt."
