Woman: Today we have Tom Parker with us in the studio, and we will be talking about his latest book called “Clever Young Minds”.

Man: Hi everyone. My book describes devices and products created by inventors who were not yet adults. And there have been a lot of such inventions. For example, a frozen drink on a stick which Americans call a popsicle.

Woman: Oh, you mean an ice lolly – that’s the word we use here in Britain. I love them.

Man: So do I! But you probably don’t know that popsicles were invented by Frank Epperson from California when he was just 11 years old.

Woman: Can you tell us the story behind the invention?

Man: Sure. One evening in the year 1905 Frank was reading on the terrace of his house and drinking a glass of fruit syrup mixed with water. There was also a wooden stick in the glass which he used to mix the drink. When it got colder, he went inside but forgot to take the drink with him. The next morning he found that the drink in the glass was frozen with the stick in it. You see, a lot of inventions happen, as in this case, just by chance!

Woman: And what happened next?

Man: Frank started making popsicles regularly for himself, and he gave them to his friends instead of cold drinks when they visited his house. When he became an adult, he started selling them in amusement parks. At the time the popsicles cost only five cents, so they became an immediate success.

Woman: What were the flavours?

Man: The first popsicles came in seven flavours, including cherry, which is still the most popular flavour. Fruit-flavoured popsicles are people’s favourite ones although nowadays there are many more flavours available including non-standard flavours like ketchup.

Woman: Thank you, Tom

Some talent shows like to accept people who just aren’t very good. The organizers think TV audiences enjoy seeing someone who sings out of tune or plays an instrument badly. In my opinion, it’s really unfair to put participants in a position where people make fun of them. An experience like that could make them less confident in their daily lives. I always feel sorry for contestants who are standing on stage and crying in front of the cameras. It’s not fair to encourage people who have no real talent to appear in such programmes.

One day I thought: "Why don't we have our own school talent show?" I went to our head teacher with the idea, and he was very keen on it. So, I got down to work and asked some of my schoolmates to give me a hand. We put up posters and every student who was interested could take part in the auditions. I also asked some teachers to be the judges. On the day of the show, I was the host. It was so much fun to watch everybody sing, dance, juggle and do other brilliant things.

While I was growing up, I had different hobbies but most of all I loved painting. My parents expected me to become an engineer so they didn't like me spending so much time painting. Luckily, my next-door neighbour, John Smith, realized that I had a natural talent. He spoke with my parents and suggested I should go to art school. At first they responded negatively, but then they changed their minds and supported me. Mr. Smith is here with us today, so I'd like to say again how grateful I am to him. Without his help, I wouldn't be where I am today.

I've had a fantastic time selecting the best story of the year. We received thousands of great entries, and the stories this year took me on all sorts of different adventures. Reading them all was such a pleasure! But the best story really fascinated me. Its author showed unusually creative writing skills! So, the moment everybody has been waiting for has finally come. Ladies and gentlemen, this year's Young Writer's Award goes to…

Woman: What do you think about this one, Mark?
Man: I don't like it. It reminds me of scrambled eggs.
Woman: So what about that green one? It would go well with the furniture in the living room.
Man: I don't like it, either.
Woman: Why don't we try to look for the wallpaper somewhere else? There is another place just round the corner. And we don't have to drive there. We can leave the car in the car park here and walk. I'm sure we'll find some better choices there.

While cooking seems like a really simple task for some, and even relaxing for others, I still can't learn how to cook. Luckily, I recently found out about The Cooking App. What's different about this app is that it isn't just full of recipes like other cooking apps. Instead, in this one well-known chefs teach you about how ingredients react with each other, and what is needed to prepare something both simple and tasty. I hope the app will develop my skills and train me to become a cook who is able to create something delicious on my own.

When you think of energy solutions, you might not imagine 100 tonnes of sand inside a huge container. But one company from Finland, after months of experiments, has developed a sand battery. It is a special metal container with sand inside. The sand is heated with wind or solar energy. Then the heat from the sand battery is used to keep local homes, offices, factories, and even swimming pools warm. The developers of the battery say it is very economical and easy to build so we can expect more to be produced soon.

When a friend told me that there is an exhibition of original costumes and models from George Lucas' Star Wars films, I knew I had to go. It is one of the coolest ways for a science-fiction fan like me to spend an afternoon. Children and adults can feel like film stars standing next to the characters and gadgets that they've always wanted to see in reality. And it's all for the price of a cinema ticket.

Woman: Martin, there is a new online writing competition. If you send in a story describing your best birthday, you can win a motorbike.

Man: Well, I could write about my 16th birthday. I can still remember every minute of it.

Woman: Why?

Man: On the day of my 16th birthday my parents suggested that I should go to the local shop which needed a new employee. I decided to give it a try. When I entered the manager's office, he asked me to fill in an application form and then there was a short interview. The manager liked my interests and personality, so he offered me the job and I accepted it.
